point of honor to imbibe enormous quanti-

Alan's wine as if they had been drinking

mead around the board of Bothon of Bay-

It may be said of Richard, who was noted

throughout his life for his abstemious hab-

refrained from carrying their drinking cus-

The Duke of Brittany-who bore the reputation of being able to vanquish, in a hand-

RICHARD PLEADING FOR ERIC.

to-hand fight or in a drinking bout, each and every Lord of those that paid him

homage-on this occasion imitated Bothon

and Sir Ivo in following their young Lord's gathered there-kept up the feasting and the no word of what he said. It was their undoubted right to listen, for if he was called

No one supposed for a moment that the Duke of Normandy had come to Nantes for any

THE PROOF.

mind how best he might approach the subject of his errand at Nantes, when the way

was thus abruptly opened, hardly found himself prepared to speak at once. Alan

"If you desire my service in battle, I am ready, my Lord, let your foes be whom they

After a moment of silence, Richard, look-

"I thank you, Duke; and doubtless the time is not far distant when I shall be glad though I do not need it yet. I am here, not

"A boon," replied Richard, "which, per-

"If I did," said Richard, gravely, "should

ing frankly at the Breton Duke, replied :

Richard, who had been debating in his

Duke to war.

I await your commands."

"A boon, my Lord?"

so ready to grant me."

THE

Two Boys

MISSOURI AND ARKANSAS

IN 1861, '62.

The Boys Liberate Cordelia's

Lover and Brother.

BY THOMAS W. KNOX,

Author of "The Boy Travelers," "The Young Nimrods," "The Voyage of the Vivian," "Fulton and Steam Navigation," "Decisive Battles Sinc Waterloo," "Marco Polo for Boys and Girls,

[COPYRIGHTED 1888 .- ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.]

CHAPTER XLIV.

RETURNING CORDELIA'S KINDNESS-JACK

the captive whom Harry was so closely

but I'm sure she'll understand."

lovers, and this circumstance determined

Harry on his course of action, and on the way to Batesville he studied how best to

He found that the young fellows were heartily tired of the war, and wanted to go home; this was particularly the case with particulars of his acquaintance with her,

other than that he had stopped at the house of Mr. Jones on his way from Springfield to girl such as the prisoner described, or rather such as her brother told about. He said he

The prisoners were fearful that something

in order to make them all the more grateful for any service he might render them.

He promised to do his best to save them from being hanged or shot, and suggested that a

"If you try to escape," said he, "you will be shot down at once; but if you obey orders

and do exactly what is told you without question, you'll find it to your advantage."

them, and on reaching camp they went de-murely to the quarters assigned them, and made not the least trouble. As soon as he was relieved of his charges Harry went straight to Gen. Vandever and asked to see him privately, a request which the General

Under the seal of confidence Harry then told the whole story of how he and Jack had given by Cordelia, and how two of the prisoners then in camp were the brother and lover of the warm-hearted girl. He wanted them set free as a return for the service she readily granted.

They promised everything he asked of great deal would depend on their conduct.

accomplish his object.

UT though he opened

why he did so. To have done so would

have been imprudent

The question to the prisoner had revealed the fact that

to the last degree.

"TO CARE FOR HIM WHO HAS BORNE THE BATTLE, AND FOR HIS WIDOW AND ORPHANS."

A Tale of the 10th Century.

"ERIC OF ARRAS."

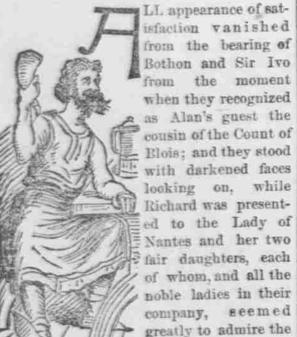

"Put My Promise of True Allegiance to the Proof."

"REMOVE HIS MANACLES."

"Tis no Blame to Him That l am Fatherless."

BY FRANCES WILSON ("FANNIE WILLIAMS") Author of "Harry Redfearn, the Young Machin-ist"; "Anthony Blake, a Boy of the Period"; "Dick Leslie's Life in Texas," "The Boys of Brythewaite School," "Rob and Bob," "Prince Olaf," "The Land Beyond the Golden Cave," "Lizabel, the Child of the Storm," etc.

> [COPYRIGHT, 1888.] CHAPTER XIII. ERIC OF ARRAS.

when they recognized as Alan's guest the cousin of the Count of Blois; and they stood with darkened faces looking on, while Richard was presented to the Lady of fair daughters, each of whom, and all the noble ladies in their company, seemed greatly to admire the graceful deportment

manding person of the young Norman Duke. Richard took pains to make a favorable example of abstinence; much to the satisimpression, without forgetting the dignity | faction of the Boy Duke, who had feared of his position as Alan's feudal Lord, but that Alan, when the banquet ended, would the banquet making ready, the smiling Bre- doomed young hostage. ton ladies, the bowing Breton Lords, yet in his heart he felt both sad and anxious.

He was impatient for the moment to and with the other ladies withdrew from remarked: arrive when he might speak to Alan of the the hall. He was followed at once by Alan the walls, poor Eric of Arras lay half starved and at-arms in attendance on the great Lords shivering with cold, his means unheeded and his tears unseen, while the laughter revel to a late hour of the night. and the music resounded gaily in the hall above. The contrast seemed so cruel in Richard's mind that he was more than ever and Osmond the Squire placed himself at resolved to save the unoffending young Richard's elbow, as was his privilege and Fleming, let the cost be what it might.

Richard had not observed the Frenchman. near, though Bothon and Sir Ivo kept their whose presence in the hall had so displeased | eyes upon their Lord, and Alan's nobles lost his loyal Danes; and Osmond of Centoville, who kept, as usual, close heside his Lord, and did not hear the remarks which passed French noble at Nanwhatever, as he did not know the kinsman of Theobald the Trickster. were interested in the wouthful son of Long & banner they expected. at no very distant THE LADY OF day, to be marshaled NANTES.

gave them his attention, ontwardly at least, though all his thoughts were with the hap- to avail myself of the willing aid you offer,

In the meantime great preparations were to seek your help in battle, but to ask a going forward in the lower part of the hall boon of you." for the usual feast in honor of so distin-

CROWDS OF RETAINERS WERE CONSTANT- haps, when I have named it, you will not be LY COMING AND GOING.

assisted Osmond in waiting on the Boy

the time, in any other castle or hall, was noisy revelry.

engaged in petting the viands ready and "Say not so!" exclaimed the Breton. "Do setting up the board; and brisk officials you doubt my friendship, Richard?" moved around among them, giving orders.

As the day declined the dark hall grew I now be here in your castle-hall, Duke darker, and the light of the hearth-fires, ex- | Alan?" cept in their immediate neighborhood, was "Shrewdly spoken, my young Lord!" not sufficient to dispel the deepening gloom : laughed Alan, who, though not a little gratiand the servants began lighting up the vast, | fied by Richard's trust in him, as proved by high-vaulted room with tall flambeaux, which were placed in iron supports along himself to know that the Boy Duke could the walls, provided for this purpose. Two not have taken such a step without some that all his pleading in the name of mercy rows of these great, flaring torches, down the opposition. He added, dryly: "Tis a won- and humanity had no effect upon his Breton sides of the hall, sent up their black smoke | der that Bernard de Harcourt permitted you to the rafters and cast their flickering light to come." upon the scene; throwing weird, fantastic Richard replied, with simple dignity:

"Count Bernard offered to come with me, shadows also, like ghostly figures of gigantic size, that danced and shifted strangely over- but I did not think it needful-especially as he had urgent affairs to keep him at Bayeux." | feudal policy. He continued:

When the board was laid for supper, and "Well, my Lord, you shall have no reason the chief director of the feast announced to regret that you came to me as to a friend." that his Lord was served, the Duke of Brit- said Alan, heartily. "Tell me, in what I have threatened, my demands tany conducted Richard to his own place at | manner can I serve you?" the head of the table; and Gareth, his beir,

Richard answered: "I will tell you in a few words, Duke. My errand here concerns your Flemish hos-

The banquet, like any other banquet of tage, Count Eric of Arras." "And what of him?" asked the Breton | ard said, reproachfully.

marked by rude abundance and rude man- Duke, surprised. ners equally, and soon became a scene of "I am informed," said Richard, "that you have cast him into prison, and sent word to | you," said Alan; "for your enemies would A customary feature, common to all occa- Flanders that his life must pay the forfeit sions of the kind, was the frequency with for those two Barons whom you held in which the drinking-cups were filled and keeping, and who recently escaped."

emptied; for the practice of what would now | "Ay," said Alan, with a grim scowl, "and upon as more a virtue than a vice in those days. In Alan's hall they drank the wines other hostages of equal rank!"

of Italy and Southern France; while the "No, Alan, not so!" said the Boy Duke, Normans at Bayenx and Centoville were boldly; "not so, if you spoke sincerely when wont to fill their beakers with the foaming | you said you would not fail me, whatever I mead, the national beverage of their ances- | might ask of you.

tors, the Danes, a people who held it as a I ASK YOU TO SPARE COUNT ERIC'S LIFE! As Richard spoke these words, he heard ties of this drink whenever they were feast- | a low but ardent exclamation, and turning ing. But, if the favored potation was not his head he saw young Gareth of Nantes, the same in all places, there was no differ- Alan's son, who had started from his place ence in the effect which it produced; for the among the noble Squires, and taken a step Norman soldiers became as uproarious over | forward, checking his impetuous movement, however, as he remembered the respect which was due to his father's liege Lord. Gareth's eyes were sparkling, and his face was full of eagerness; but Alan looked astounded.

"What, you, my Lord!" he cried. "You ask me to spare him! Do you forget whose its, that he did not like these tumultuous orgies; and, as a mark of homage and re- son he is?"

"No, Duke, I do not forget." spect for his example, his chief liegemen "He is the son of your father's murderer!" said Alan, sternly. toms to the usual excess when he was present.

Richard, sadly but calmly, rejoined: "I know it; and as such, Duke Alan, I have promised to save him, if it lies within my power."

ing brow. Richard answered:

"To Eric's foster-father, a good burgher of Arras, who brought him up from infancy, and loved him well enough to take the peril of a journey to Bayeux, in the hope of movto him that I am fatherless."

The young Duke spoke these words with of Arnulf's son." all the simple pathos of a boy's entreaty for another boy in trouble, and yet in tones face and his voice, alike, were earnest with Alan." the noble impulse which moved his youthwith all the honors paid him and all the be so flushed with wine as to be in no fit | ful heart, though his clear accents faltered, splender of Alan's crowded hall, the music, mood for hearing an appeal in favor of his for a moment, when he alluded to the sad loss of his father; and Alan, who had list-Richard left the banquet-board when the ened with a sullen look, at first, relaxed the Lady of Nantes and her daughters arose, stern expression of his countenance, as he Fleming. Here is Gareth, my son, has hapless Flemish youth, on whose account Duke and all the nobles who had been seated how to work upon your feelings; and I forbid his naming Count Eric in my preshis journey had been undertaken; for it with him at the board; while the common blame you not. It would be strange, in- ence." made him unhappy to remember, as he crowd of retainers—the small army of ser- deed, if your father's son could be hardviewed that festive scene, that in some dun- vants and soldiers who belonged at Nantes, hearted, at your age; but arguments of such geon, dark and damp, beneath those eastle and all the throng of underlings and men- a nature cannot alter my resolve. If the burgher wished to save Count Eric, he should have gone to Arnulf with his plea. The boy would be as safe in Brittany as he could be The Boy Duke and his Breton subject in Arras, if his father would but send me seated themselves beside the blazing hearth, | back my hostages."

do that," said Richard; "or, perhaps, he canduty at all times; but no one else drew not. Has he not sent you any word whatever, in answer to your warning?"

"None, my Lord." "And yet," said Richard, in a serious tone, "it seems a hard thing to believe that even to battle, they must all prepare to follow. Arnulf the Wicked, after sending his innocent son to answer for his own evil deed. can leave him now to perish, and make no yet, he will send you back the Barons. Do "And now, my Lord," said Alan, "if you | you think he will, Duke Alan?"

fixed the sentence with a vigorous objurga- to me more like a younger brother than a silent submission to the cruel fate, so wholly tion, addressed to the patron saint of Nantes

ERIC AND HIS JAILER.

-"Count Eric will hang, fast enough! I am not wont to palter in such a matter, and trifle with my word; and Arnulf knows it his coming to Nantes, was shrewd enough | fice his son to save his Barons."

Richard perceived with disappointment vassal. Evidently, Alan looked upon such youth, but not to be considered for a moment in deciding an important question of

"I have given the Count of Flanders full time and fair warning, and now, if I fail to will meet with small respect hereafter, in Flanders or anywhere else."

"Then you will not spare the Flemish boy, as a boon to me, Duke Alan, though you promised to refuse me nothing?" Rich-

"Nay, my Lord, but this would be no take it as a token of your weakness. They would think you are afraid of Arnulf." "LET MY ENEMIES THINK WHAT THEY

PLEASE;

dignified response. He was about to speak further, but a look to the Flemish boy: of sudden recollection crossed the face of Alan, and he interrupted, in a low tone of until this moment, I had forgotten his pres- spite of his unmerited misfortunes; and, Scouting and Fighting Adventures of ence. You will be scarcely pleased to see meeting Gareth's eves, he smiled, as if pleased him here, yet I believe his errand is the to see his friend; but his wrists were shacksame as your own."

Frenchman was nowhere to be seen. He fasting, was hardly able to support the chain had slipped away from the banquet, unper- that weighed him down. ceived by anyone save Bothon and Sir Ivo, who both, from the moment when they first caught sight of him, had watched him with suspicious eyes, until they saw him leave the

"I see him not," said Alan. "Doubtless he has withdrawn himself, in dread of your displeasure, my Lord, if you beheld him "To whom did you give that promise, my here. In truth, I never saw a man so ill at called him; and the Boy Duke determined, Lord?" inquired the Breton, with a darken- ease as he was, when he learned that we in his own mind that never should this were momently expecting your arrival."

asked Richard, in surprise.

Alan answered: this morning; a kinsman of the Count of guarded, and he has not strength to bear ing me to help him. If you had seen the Blois, and a strange visitor for you to meet them. At my desire, will you not have anguish of that good old man, Duke Alan, with under my roof Richard. I have had them taken of?" you would not wonder that my heart was no opportunity for a sech with him as yet; touched, and that I told him I would come and I doubt not he would have gone away evident from the tone of his reply that he to Nantes myself, and intercede with you at once, when he heard of your coming, had was losing patience with what he regarded to spare the poor young Count. I trust I I not constrained him to remain until I as Richard's foolish pity for the ill-fated shall not plead in vain; 't would be a cruel | should have time to learn the object of his | hostage. thing, for no guilt of his own, to take the visit. I wondered what your enemy's near "I have refused my son that same relife of one so young, so brave and yet so gen- kinsman could want here, my Lord, in the quest," he answered. though he is the son of Arnulf, it is not I understand it. The Count of Flanders unseemly. Duke, for me to take his part, and the Count of Blois are allies, as you say; He is a boy like myself, and 't is no blame and Theobald, perhaps, has sent his cousin and I, for once, are in accord. Yet I fear his pledged allegiance. It appeared that he made resolute by the knowledge of his power | you will hardly consent to make terms with to command, if his entreaties failed. His him when my entreaties fail to move you,

"No," said Alan, grimly; "not unless he offers me two hostages as good as those two Barons—and that, assuredly, he will not do. But, my Lord, you are not the only one who has appealed to me on behalf of this young wearied me with such entreaties, until I was "I see, my Lord, this burgher well knew forced to silence him with harsh words, and

Richard, with a bright smile, turned to Gareth, saving: "THEN YOU ALSO ARE SORRY FOR HIM,

GARETH?" "More than sorry, my Lord," said Gareth, mournfully. "I am grieved for him, as I should be for any poor youth in his unhappy | drawing near, said to him, in a low voice: situation; but I love Eric for his own sake. "The burgher says Count Arnulf will not He and I have been good friends ever since he came to Nantes."

the hall. I mean,'

Gareth answered, simply: land, far away from his home and all his tion. friends; he must have been often sad at heart-but he never showed it. He always other purpose than to summon his vassal attempt to save him. It may be that, even bore himself as cheerfully as any born re- Briancourt. Here was another boy, as young tainer in our hall. That burgher of Arras told the truth-Eric is brave as well as "Not he," returned the Breton Duke. gentle, and courteous as a Prince. He looks self as bravely as had the robber-Baron's "Arnulf has better use for all his Barons, in as noble as he is, my Lord; if you could see son, and in a worse extremity of trouble; these uneasy times." He added-and pre- him, you would not wonder that he seems but, to Richard's mind, Eric of Arras, in his stranger and a hostage."

looking at the Duke of Brittany." "You shall, my Lord, if you desire it," answered Alan.

He summoned an official of the castle, and bade him go and tell the warder of the cells to bring out the imprisoned Flemish hostage | lips uttered no complaint, they smiled upon and conduct him to the hall. As the official departed to carry out this order, Richard, turning his glance again on Gareth, observed that the young Breton's eyes were wet with tears; and he said, within himself: "When Gareth rules in Brittany there will be little use for dungeon-cells beneath hearted father."

So thought the Boy Dake, as he gazed on Alan's son, whose manly face and graceful, enough for either course. heart. But, ah! how sad would Richard's heart have grown, could be have looked into the future, at that moment, and seen what lay in store for this young, gallant soul-for Gareth never ruled in Brittany. Long years well. It is clear enough he intends to sacri- sleeping in a warrior's grave; for he perished fighting bravely in Richard's cause, a vouthful knight, "without reproach or fear."

If we search for Gareth's name in history we shall only find the record of the great, victorious battle where he fell; an event to lenient sentiments as pardonable, and even | which all things were tending, in the lives proper, to the enthusiasm of soft-hearted of our boy hero and his friends, and to which this narrative must also come in due timethe closing scene, alike, of Gareth's life and Norman Richard's boyhood.

It is well, however, that the future is not revealed to human eyes, till it becomes the present; and Richard, therefore, was neither elated by any fore-knowledge of its glory, nor saddened by any premonition of its wo.

His reflections on the strange difference between Duke Alan's granite hardness and the merciful and kindly disposition of his son, were terminated by the entrance of Alan's official and the young Flemish Count, service; it would rather be an injury to conducted by his jailer. The latter, a huge, dark-visaged Breton churl, whose lowering brows and harsh, forbidding features produced on the beholder an impression of pitiless rigor and severity, came forward with his captive to the dais-steps, and there stood, be called very hard drinking, was looked three days hence he hangs, unless Count I fear neither Arnulf the Wicked nor his with his hand upon the prisoner's shoulder, Arnulf sends me back the Barons, or two friend, the Count of Blois," was Richard's silently awaiting further orders. Alan, hower, did not speak to him, but said, sternly,

"Come nearer, Count Eric."

The captive youth advanced, without a word, and stood before the Breton Duke and "Your words, my Lord, remind me that I his Boy Lord, on the dais. He tried to hold have here a guest who came unbidden, and, up his head, and to show a brave spirit, in eled with heavy links of iron, while his pale And Alan looked around among his guests and worn young face, made paler in appearand followers on the dais, and sent a search- ance by the black hair, unkempt and taning glance down the long, crowded hall, gled, which overhung his forehead, told a where the feast was still in progress and the plain tale of cruel suffering. His slender revel at its hight; but the gaily-attired frame, weakened by confinement and long-

CHAPTER XIV.

ALAN'S SON AND LONGSWORD'S. Richard's heart swelled with compassion, as the young Fleming stood before him, bowed and trembling with the burden of fetters and the weakness of his limbs, yet princely and courageous, even as Gareth noble youth go back to the dungeon-cell "What guest is this of whom you speak?" | from which he had emerged. He said to his Breton vassal:

"Duke Alan, I see no need of these heavy "A French Lord, who arrived at Nantes | shackles on the hands of a prisoner so closely

Alan's face clouded once more, and it was

will not refuse your Lord." He spoke no longer in the manner of appeal, for he had inwardly decided that he hither to offer terms of ransom for the life should be more likely to carry his point with the Duke of Brittany by dropping all "If so," said Richard, "the Count of Blois entreaties and making a plain demand on was right, for Alan, after a moment of seeming irresolution, said, hastily:

"Well, well, 'tis a matter of no great importance. Have your way, my Lord!" He beckoned the churlish jailer to approach, and with a motion of his hand toward the fettered Flemish youth, commanded, briefly: "Remove his manacles." The jailer, without a change of his impassive countenance, obeyed the order, and stolidly went back to his place below the The young Fleming had not spoken, but he dropped his aching arms beside him, with a sigh of comfort, as he gazed in grateful boy whose potent intercession had gained him this relief; and Gareth of Nantes, "IT IS THE DUKE OF NORMANDY." Count Eric started as he heard this title, and sharply caught his breath; his eyes "Then he has not been unhappy here?" dilated, and for one instant he shrunk away said Richard. "When he was with you in from Richard as if in mortal terror. But, quickly recovering his calmness, he raised wonder on the unfamiliar features of the

his head again, and met the Boy Duke's "My Lord, he was a stranger in a strange | eyes with a look of sad but patient resigna-Richard at that moment was forcibly reminded of his recent meeting with Guy de and as proudly-born as he, and also suffering for his father's wickedness, who bore himundeserved, from which he saw no prospect "I should like to see him," said Richard, of escape, seemed to present a type of courage far more touching than the fierce defiance and bitter scorn of pain which marked the bearing of his own young vassal. Eric also suffered without flinching, but he suffered without anger; and though his pale his friend. Richard's heart was moved, not only with pity for his woes, but even more with admiration for his quiet fortitude. It was plain to see what thought was in the mind of the son of Arnulf the Wicked as he stood before the son of William Longsword; for this boy Duke had power to Forsyth, and remembered seeing a young hasten the moment of his death, or to his castle; he is not like his stern, hard- lengthen out his end in lingering paugs of torture; and, according to the cruel customs | could not remember the name, but thought | Its only line of march was back to Rolla, or too common at that time, he had excuse it was Corinne, or Cor-something or other.

stately form, showed him well worthy of "The Duke of Normandy!" said Eric, slowly, terrible would happen to them, as they had his warrior sire, though he had a gentle looking from Gareth to Richard, and back heard the usual wild stories about the baragain to Gareth, and then gazing at his own barity of the Yankees. Harry encouraged slim hands, freed from their galling chain, as if their belief as far as he thought judicious, he wondered why the Duke of Normandy had done him so much kindness,

"Ay!" said Alan, harshly. "Look well upon him, Fleming; 'tis my young, orphaned before Duke Alan died, his eldest son lay Lord, whose father should still be living to command my service, but for the bloody deed of your red-handed sire! And for what purpose, think you, has the Duke of Normandy come hither at this time?" Eric sighed, but he answered with a steady

"He has come, perhaps, to demand my speedy death." "Your death!" growled Alan. "If it were so, he might have quickly had his will! But allow. He asks that you may live!" "That I may live?" repeated Eric. "Ay, well may you marvel to hear so strange a story, but it is true," said Alan. "Richard of Normany is here to intercede for you!"

he asks for that which I am not so willing to

Eric again repeated, blankly: "Richard of Normandy-to intercede for "Yes, Count Eric," said Richard, in his gen tle voice; "for it would grieve me, more than I can say, if one so noble and so unoffending as yourself should meet so sad a fate. If I have

"My Lord," said Alan, impatiently, "I trust you will not put your influence with me to such unworthy use. 'Twould be a fine tale, in time he specially desired that neither the sooth, for Raoul de Chartres to tell the Count of Blois that he might have spared his pains, for prisoners nor anyone else should know or Alan of Brittany dared not carry out his threat. for fear of Arnulf's vengeance!" "Nay, Duke," said Richard, smiling, the

(Continued on 2d page.)

any influence with my good friend, the Duke

of Brittany, I trust you will be spared."

"We can easily arrange that," answered the General. " I'll see Gen. Curtis and ask man who told that tale would meet with little credit anywhere. It is known too well that him to turn the prisoners over to me, to do hand for a 20-days' supply, which was conwith as I think best; I've no doubt he'll do sidered sufficient to carry them through to suspect the real reason of his request.

it, and if he does there won't be any trouble about the other details." An hour later the General sent for Harry, who responded with alacrity to the call. "It's all right," said the General as soon as Harry came into his presence. "The five horses that you and Jack captured that night are worth more to us than the prisoners; the men might not like to know they've been traded for horses, but that's the way I look at it. Go and see if you can get the prisoners to take an oath not to serve in the rebel armies again during the war, and you may tell them they'll be released if they'll

Harry went at once to the guardhouse, where the prisoners were confined, and it did not take long for them to make the desired promise. He explained that he had

WORKING THE SWEEPS.

urged their case before the General, and had persuaded the latter to grant his request on condition that they went home at once and guarding was the son of Mr. Jones, the staid there, and furthermore that they signed treacherous host from whom the two youths | the required oath and gave no further aid in had such a narrow escape, and the brother any way to the war.

of the girl who had given them the hint This being arranged, the prisoners were which led to their hasty departure. He had taken before Gen. Vandever, who gave them joined Price's army, as originally intended, a severe lecture, pretended he was opposed and was serving with a cavalry regiment | to letting them loose, but had only done so that had been assigned to the duty of har- at the urgent request of Harry, who beassing the Union forces and preventing lieved them to be honest, but misguided, their obtaining the supplies they desired. and who felt sure they would live up to His company was the one with which the their promise. There was much more talk Union cavalry had disputed the possession to the same effect, all tending to show that of the haystack, as described in the last | they owed their liberation to Harry and Jack; and finally the papers were signed, "Now, thought Harry, "I've got a chance | the oath was taken, and the prisoners were to pay off the girl for her kindness to us. escorted to the lines and allowed to go on I'll get her brother free and send him home their way toward Forsyth and home.

to her. He'll never know how it came about, It was afterward ascertained that the arrival of the pair at the Jones mansion was Further questioning showed that another | the cause of great astonishment to the family, of the prisoners was a near neighbor of young and especially to the senior Jones, who had Jones, and that he was very much attached | been in mortal terror ever since that night to Miss Cordelia; in fact, the twain were for fear that the youths would cause his house to be burned over his head in revenge for his treachery. Cordelia blushed down to the roots of her hair, but her blushes were attributed to her joy at seeing her lover and brother safe at home from the wars. No one had the slightest suspicion that she had aught to do with the escape of the youths and the capture of the horses. As the returned soldiers babbled on about the kindness of Harry, and how he had brought about their liberation, the tears came into her eyes, and it was with great difficulty that she preserved her composure.

The young men kept t' promises to stay at home and have not. & more to do with the war. They were repeatedly urged to violate their oaths and return to the army, and more than once efforts were made to carry them away by force. Days and days together they hid in the brush to avoid the rebel scouting parties that ranged through the country, only coming to their homes at night, and not then unless signals were given that they could safely do so. The oath they took at the time of their liberation did not provide for their exchange, or in any way afford them reason to expect anything but death in case they should be taken with arms in their hands. Each of them had a copy of the oath, and whenever the young lover, whose interest was greatly he wavered in his determination to stay out roused when he found that Harry had seen of the rebel service, a perusal of the docuthe girl he left behind him. Harry gave no ment generally set him right.

Let us now return to Harry and Jack, whom we left in camp at Batesville.

As before stated, the army, weakened by the withdrawal of a portion of its numbers, which were sent to aid in the siege of Corinth, and being short of provisious and ammunition, was in no condition to advance upon Little Rock.

"PAUNCHEOUS PILOT."

through the country that lay between it and the Mississippi River. The movement upon Rolla would be a retrograde one, while that tobeen saved from capture by the warning | ward the Mississippi would be an advance; consequently the latter was selected without hesi-

From the 6th of May until the 24th of June the army lay at Batesville, making preparations for its future movements. Word came that gunboats and transports were ascending the had rendered the two youths, but at the same | White River, and would probably come to Jacksonport, which is 25 miles below Batesville and at the junction of the White with the Black River. For 10 days previous to the departure from Batesville Capt. Winslow, the Quartermaster-in-Chief of Gen. Curtis's army, bought corn and other provisions, and saved